

Is there any way to avoid this? A: You can avoid this by explicitly specifying the path to the directory containing the images (in this case, it should be /assets/img/ so that it's relative to your current working directory). For example: Q: How to see the files in an NSBundle? I have an application bundle. I want to load a single file from it, let's call it photo.png. How can I do this? I want to examine the contents of the NSBundle to understand how to do this. A: You just have to load the resource like this: `NSArray *bundles = [[NSBundle mainBundle] bundlesForResourceOfType:@"png" inDirectory:@""];` The returned array will contain the list of all files of type png that are included in the bundle. So if you have a file called photo.png then you have: `NSString *path = [bundles objectAtIndex:0];` and so on for the other ones. Now you can access the file like this: `NSArray *paths = [NSArray arrayWithObject:path];` The content of the file photo.png will now be accessible in the object with the name paths. You can also access them directly if you add them to the main bundle: `NSBundle *bundle = [NSBundle mainBundle]; NSString *path = [bundle pathForResource:@"photo" ofType:@"png"];` And access the file this way: `NSData *data = [NSData dataWithContentsOfFile:path];` If the file is in a directory, you can take the first one with the file name without the directory like this: `NSArray *paths = [NSArray arrayWithObjects: [bundle pathForResource:@"photo" ofType:@"png"], [bundle pathForResource:@"photo2" ofType:@"png"],`
